Preface

This dictionary is based on a wider experience with the usage of words than any one person can ever have in his own lifetime. A great body of information about words has been built up over many years, and lexicographers have made it their business to collect it and to organize it in dictionary form. We have endeavored to bring you authoritative data on every word you are likely to use in school, office, or home and in your daily contacts with people.

A great quantity of matter has been compiled in this work in very moderate compass, and the wide scope of this volume should meet the needs of the most exacting dictionary user. It is recognized that a dictionary suited to the popular demand for such a work should possess the three important qualities of accuracy, completeness, and convenience. This work carries an outstanding background of authority and scholarship and is a source to which you may turn with complete confidence for an understanding of the meaning, pronunciation, spelling, and proper use of the words with which you are unfamiliar.

In selecting the words for inclusion in this dictionary, the net has been cast fairly widely. The greatest importance is naturally attached to words in literary and colloquial use at the present day. At the same time, a large number of purely technical and scientific words and terms have been included since many of these necessarily play a considerable part in the lives of important sections of the community. Meanings and shades of meaning are carefully distinguished and explained, not with synonyms or confusing technical terms, but in clearly worded, simplified form, illustrated by quotations or brief phrases whenever necessary for lucidity.

The compilers of this dictionary have made it possible for the reader to find instantly the word or information he seeks, including at the same time such details as the spelling and pronunciation, as well as the origin of words so that he can appreciate how far reaching are the sources of our language. For easy reference, main entries are displayed in large, extra bold type the full width of the column, with definitions and other text matter slightly indented.

In order to carry out the principle of conciseness, the method of grouping related words in a single paragraph has been adopted. Particularly, primary words followed by a number of derivatives are thus grouped, and compounds are listed under the word that forms their first element.

We have included the name of WEBSTER, the great American lexicographer, in the title of this dictionary in recognition of his important contribution to the principles of lexicography.

ON THE ORIGIN OF WORDS

Alexander McQueen

On almost every page of this dictionary are clues to the origin and development of our language. Such clues may be traced from mankind's earliest days—through the ancient civilizations of Greece and Rome—and into the modern period, where, with the piling up of new discoveries in the arts and sciences, the invention of new words has become almost commonplace.

Every word we use has a history, and in almost every case it is a story of action—a story of something happening. This word-forming activity has been going on for thousands of years, ever since the first human beings uttered the first human sounds. We have inherited a rich legacy from the past.

SOUND AND SENSE

Many of our most stirring impressions come to us through elementary speech sounds. Conclusive proof of this statement can be found in the radio script that depends for dramatic effect not only on words but also on other sounds—of closing doors, tramping feet, rippling water, howling wind, ticking clocks, crashing collisions, and no end of other noises.

The use of sound effects is as old as man. Early men got along with a small stock of words, and they probably began with sound effects. For telling about violence, such as shattering or breaking, they made noises with smashing sounds, which in time became such dictionary words as smash, dash, bash, dash, crash, crash. It is easy to add to such a list of words ending in -sh, meaning something to do with violence.

To show how a sound might suggest a whole group of words, let us take an imaginary situation. Suppose that an ancient Teuton has gone to sleep. He sleeps with his mouth open, and as he breathes he makes a queer noise, a mixture of whistling and nasal humming. Someone observing the sleeping man imitates him like this: "Sss-norr!" In the evolution of language these sounds have been retained; today when we refer to this noise made by a sleeper, we call it a snore. Other nasal words have been built on the same pattern. A more abrupt sound, in waking hours, became a snort. A growl through the nose was called a snarl. A sudden breathing into the nose was called a sniff. A laugh like "eh-eh-eh" was called a snicker. The nose of an animal was called a snout. A scornful glance, with upturned nose, became a sneer. And a sort of nasal explosion became a sneeze. One could make a long list of words starting with sn, all related to the nose. It isn't by accident that sense and sound go together. The Choctaws have a very expressive word for sneeze; it has three syllables, ha-bish-ko. When the Choctaw says it quickly, with stress on the bish, it's a perfect sound effect for a sneeze.

In a dictionary are hundreds of these imitative words: the tick-tick of the clock, the ding-dong of the bell, the boom of the cannon. To describe an overabundance of talking, we use such words as chatter or jabber. Then there is babble, not very different from jabbering. It is possible that babble came from the simple sound ba-ba and from the prattle of a baby, whose first words are usually made with the lips. The sound ba-ba reminds us of a more complicated word—barbarian. In ancient times, when there was little travel from one land to another, men seldom had a chance to learn foreign languages. When they met a foreigner, they had to talk through an interpreter. And although most of the men of the Old World knew only one language, they despised people of other countries who also knew only their own native tongue. In fact, the Greeks used to say that the language of foreigners sounded like "bar-bar-bar." In time foreigners began to be nicknamed the "bar-bar" people. That particular nickname found its way into the regular language of the Greeks, then of the Romans, and we have it in a form that came through the Latin—barbarian. So even the ancient Greeks, with their keen sense of the niceties of language, sometimes made a dictionary word out of a simple sound. In doing so they were giving a sort of classic approval to the methods of our remotest ancestors, who enriched our speech with sounds that made sense.

WORDS FROM GREEK

The classic tongue of Greece—the language of Homer and Plato and Aristotle—is one of the most important sources of our everyday speech. You have already learned something of the Greek language. You started when you learned your ABC's; when you referred to the alphabet, you were just saying the names of the two Greek letters alpha and beta, that is, A and B. A little later, when you talked about arithmetic, you were very nearly saying arithmos, the Greek word for "numbers."

You can't go into the kitchen and wash dishes without handling something with a Greek name. The very word dish is Greek. At first it was diskos, meaning "quoit." Later the meaning was extended to include dishes.

One word from the ancient Greek shows how meanings change. The rich men in Greece had an easy life—no tiresome work to do—plenty of leisure time. To this spare time they gave the name of scho-le. In their scho-lē they were devoted to discussion, study, and instruction. Because they studied in their scho-lē, they were called scholars; and the place where they studied came to be called school. So schooltime was spare time, and the pleasure found in that spare time was the pleasure of study.

Among familiar personal names are many that come from the Greek, as George, Philip, and Eugene. The name George means "landman, or farmer." The geo in the name George is simply the Greek word for "earth." It is in geography and geology and geometry; they all have something to do with the earth.

The name Philip means one who loves horses; philos, "loving"; hippos, "horse." A hippodrome is a racecourse where horses run. A hippopotamus is a river horse; potamos is Greek for "river."

The name Eugene means "well-born": eu-, "good, well"; genesis, "birth." Most words starting with eu have a sense that is good, pleasant, or beautiful. Euphony has to do with pleasant sounds; eulogy, pleasant sayings or words. A speech praising someone is a eulogy.

Now for some girls' names: Margaret, she's a pearl; Dora, she's a gift; Catherine, she's pure; Irene, she's peaceful—that is, if you go by their Greek names. And the Greeks did have a name for almost everything. When you say that this great nation of ours is a democracy, you're talking Greek—demos-kratein, "people-governing." Democracy is government by the people. The same Greeks who gave us the name of our kind of government gave us the word politics. It comes from the Greek polis, "city." The Greeks gave us also the precious word economy. They called it oikonomos, from oikos, "house," and nomos, "management." That's the spirit of economy—the management of a house. And because economy has so much to do with the home, some of the world's best economists are women.

Speaking of women and housekeeping, marriage customs in ancient Greece emphasized business rather than romance. Sometimes the man never saw his wife until the wedding day. However, even if he didn't see her face, he always wanted to be sure about her dowry, that is, the money and other things of value that she would bring to him, as a sort of premium. Almost everything she owned became his. But under the old Greek law every bride was allowed to keep certain articles as her own, such as personal belongings and articles of adornment. These things would be carefully listed, and it was understood that the husband would have no control over them. What he got was the phernē, or dowry. The things the bride kept were the parapherna: para, "independent of"; phernē, "dowry." On the day of an ancient Greek wedding the bride came home, taking great care to keep her own special treasures separate from the ones that would belong to her husband. It might be a strange collection of unrelated things, but it was her very own—her parapherna. And that's how we came by our word paraphernalia, meaning "a miscellaneous collection of accessories or equipment."

People who guess at the derivation of words and then refer to the dictionary often find that their guess was wrong. Guessing is not safe. A comet and a comma look somewhat alike (each has a round part and a tail); so someone says, "They must be related." But they're not. Comet is from Greek kometes, "long-haired," because of the trail of light the comet leaves behind. Comma, Greek komma, means "a section or segment, something cut off"; a comma slightly cuts off part of a sentence. Now someone may say, "Is a comic long-haired?" No. He gets his name from Greek kōsmos, "a revel." Today many children give the word comic an entirely new meaning; they use it to mean any pictured story in strip form. They even talk about "Bible comics," an example of how the meaning of a word gets "pushed around."

Pharmacist is from Greek pharmakon, "poison." Many ancient medicinal drugs were more or less poisonous; hence the name of their dispenser.

Glamour is merely another form of grammar. Because grammar at one time meant "magic" or "fascination," glamour took on the meaning "witchery, allurements." This word also is Greek.

A dilemma is not an animal, in spite of its two horns. The word comes from Greek di, "double," and lemma, "proposition or assumption." When we have to choose between two propositions, each unfavorable to us, we are said to be "on the horns of a dilemma."

WORDS FROM LATIN

Latin is not a dead language, for it plays a lively part in our everyday speech. Sometimes we recognize it and applaud it. That word applaud is Latin; in Latin it's applaudere and usually means the clapping of hands. It is one of the thousands of Latin words that help give life to our language. So were I to say that Latin is totally dead, I would not be entirely candid. Candid is another Latin word; it means "fair, frank, or just." Candid, the Latin candidus, really meant "white, pure." In ancient Rome when a politician was running for office and went on a speechmaking tour, he wore white garments as a sign of good, clean politics. So our own officeseekers are called candidates. Next time you burn a candle, remember that its name is also from the Latin candidus, "white." Our republic gets its name from Latin respublica: res, "thing, interest"; publica, "public." Many of our political terms are derived from the Latin. Take the word senate; it's just another form of the Latin senatus, "council of old men." Senators are supposed to be old enough to be wise. Men who are junior (pure Latin for "younger") are seldom found in a senate. The senate calls for men who are senior ("older"). In fact, senior and senate are of the same origin.

Many of the Latin words in our language are quite lively. Take the word rivals. We know what rivals are. If several men are competitors in business or are running a race, they are rivals. If several young men are courting the same girl, they are rivals in love. But why are they called rivals? The Latin word for stream is rivus; when two men lived near a stream and had to share that stream between them, they were called rivales, or rivals. The word originally meant “partners”; but when two persons have to share something, it is easy for partnership to lead to contention. So the Latin word for stream became our word for rivalry in sports, in business, in love, or in war.

Speaking of war, Roman soldiers usually got part of their wages in salt, because salt was considered essential to human life. The Latin word for salt was sal; the salt pay was called salarium. From that word came our word salary. Sometimes, if we consider that a man is lazy and isn't earning his salary, we say, “He isn't earning his salt.” Note that word consider, which means “to study, to meditate, to reflect upon something.” It's a simple word with a romantic origin. In Latin it was two words: con, “with”; sider, “a star.” It comes from the days when men, for guidance in their decisions, turned for help to the stars. This use of consider is found in the English of Psalm 8: “When I consider Thy heavens . . . the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained.”

We take our words from old Roman politicians, stream dwellers, senators, soldiers—and farmers. When a Roman farmer was plowing and became careless, his plowshare would turn out of the furrow; and when his neighbors saw that his plowing had gone awry, they would say, “He has turned from the furrow.” In Latin a furrow is lira; and “to turn out of the furrow” is de-lira, the source of our word delirious. When a man is temporarily out of his mind, he has turned aside from his proper mental furrow. When he comes to himself, and we might say that he's back on the right track, the old Romans said, “He's back in the right furrow.”

The Rome of 20 centuries ago was built on seven hills. One was called the Palatium; on this Palatium, or Palatine Hill, the Emperor Augustus built a magnificent house. It was thought to be the last word in royal residences. But it wasn't, for a little later the Emperor Nero built another on the self-same hill. His house, called the Golden House, was still grander than the one built by Augustus. These royal houses gave their name to all royal houses to come. Because they were built on the Palatine Hill, they were called palatial; and it is from them that we get our word palace.

When you listen carefully, you are paying attention, or attending to what is being said. Attention is from attentio, the Latin word for a “stretching of the mind toward something.” The same idea is in our word tension, which also means “stretching.” And speaking of stretching, let us imagine a Roman strong man showing the remarkable development of his muscles. As he stretches out his arm and makes one of his muscles move between his elbow and his shoulder, somebody says, “It looks like a little mouse!” Now the Latin word for mouse is mus, and a little mouse is musculus. Musculus in time was changed to muscule, and now we call it muscle.

Consider the words host and guest. Both are derived from the Latin hostis. One offers hospitality, the other receives it—a friendly arrangement. But, oddly enough, hostis also meant “an enemy,” which does not sound so friendly. The history of the words provides an explanation. In the days before hotels the person needing hospitality was a stranger, and all strangers were feared as possible enemies.

Another tricky word is miniature. Because a miniature is something small, one might suppose that it is related to minus and minimum. But it comes from the Latin minium, meaning “red lead,” with which certain ancient pictures were painted. The word came to be connected with small pictures and then with small objects.

We have considered candid and candidate, both coming from Latin candidus, “white.” What about candy? Did it, too, come from this source? No. Candy gets its name from the Arabic word qand, meaning “sugar.”

Confute is a dignified word; it means “to disprove” or “to show that an argument is false.” Its original significance, however, from the Latin was “to throw water on something.” And absurd, another word from the Latin, joins ab, “from,” to surdus, “deaf,” suggesting an amusing misunderstanding by a deaf person.

WORDS THAT STAND OR STAY

One of the simplest words in our language is stand. It is very old and is related to many other words. It has been traced to an ancient Indo-European root, sta, which appears in many Greek and Latin words. Sta suggests stability, “strength to stand without being moved or overthrown.” A stable is a place where horses stand. A stage is a platform whereon someone stands to act. An establishment is something that is fixed, reliable, standing. A standard is a flag or other sign around which loyal soldiers can stand; it is also a norm by which the standing of other things may be measured.

The sta root is seen unchanged in hundreds of words. A staple is an item of merchandise that is kept in stock, that is, a standing, always available, item. A staple is also a fastening device, to keep things, as it were, standing. A stall is a place where people stand to buy and sell goods. If the customer stands too long without buying, he may be charged with stalling. Things become stale from standing too long. A man's status indicates his standing in the community. When the man becomes old, he may need a staff to aid him in standing. Ecstasy might be described as a kind of “out-standing emotion.”

To recite all of the sta words would be tiring. And even if we exhausted the list of sta words, we would encounter scores of related ste words. The homestead is where the home stands. One who is steady is one who is able to stand well. The printer's notation set is pure Latin for “let it stand.” In such words as destiny, the sta element appears as sti; destiny is a sort of predetermined stand in a person's future.

NONCLASSICAL WORD SOURCES

English, with its richness, power, and beauty, is indebted to many languages other than Greek and Latin. A few examples will illustrate this debt.

Long ago in a town in France a young man was in his workshop. As he worked, a group of his friends came by and called, "Come along, Pierre, don't work so hard. Come with us and have a good time; you can leave your shop." Now, the old French word for shop was bauche or bawtch; and the French word for luring a man away from his shop, or, as we might say, un-shopping him, was dé-baucher. Today if we entice a man away from his duty and attempt to corrupt him, we are said to be debauching him.

Among the ancient French a man and his wife sometimes had arguments. If the husband shouted at his wife, she might begin to look pathetic, with tear-filled eyes and pouting lips. Now her husband couldn't bear to see her lips sticking out like that, so he built a special little room into which she might retire to pout. Since the French word for pouting was bouder, the lady's pouting room came to be called the boudoir, a household word today.

In the days of Richard II of England men lost their heads for uttering a single word; it was the word havoc. Havoc was a dangerous word. In war the shout "Havoc" was a signal for soldiers to lay waste the countryside and to plunder and kill without mercy. That's what Shakespeare meant in his famous line in Julius Caesar, "Cry 'Havoc!' and let slip the dogs of war." When the cry "Havoc" was raised in a rebellion, it was a call to revolt against the government; for shouting "Havoc" in such a case, the shouter was condemned to lose his head.

The ancient Scottish Highlanders believed in battle cries. They called them army yells. In the Gaelic tongue, army is sluagh; yell is ghairm. Put them together, and it's sluagh-ghairm, or, as it is pronounced today, slogan. A good slogan is always short, something one can yell out easily while rushing full tilt at his opponent. Slogans are handy in advertising.

In Hungary, not far from the twin cities of Buda and Pest, is a town named Kocs. In Hungarian it's pronounced "kotch." In the little town of Kocs more than 500 years ago a man designed a special carriage for the king. It was a large four-wheeled carriage, with a roof. To make it ride easier on the rough roads, it was suspended on springs. In time such carriages became very popular. Because they were first made at the town of Kocs, they were called coaches; and that's what we call them today. Even when we use the word coach for a tutor or an athletic trainer, such as a football coach, we're carrying out the same idea. A human coach, like the oldtime carriage, helps the student get along faster.

Let's change the scene to East India, about a hundred years ago, and pay a visit to an Indian prince. He offers us a cool drink, of pleasant taste. We ask him what it is. He explains that it is made of arrack, tea, sugar, lemon, and water—five different elements. Now the Hindustani word for five is panch, pronounced almost like punch. So we call the drink punch.

In London, in the days of Queen Victoria, the people often wondered whether the national income was going to be enough to pay the national expenses. They called it "balancing the budget." The expression sounds perfectly natural to us, for we too have budgets to balance. But why is an annual statement of finances called a budget? It's from the old British custom of enclosing the annual estimates of revenue and expenditures in a leather purse or bag for presentation to the House of Commons. The name of the bag came from an old French word, bougette, or, as we pronounce it, "budget."

In delving into the history of the English language we find a group of unfortunates—people who have come down in the world: a villain, a hussy, a boor, a pagan, a savage, an imp, a knave, a silly, an idiot, and a hypocrite. All have seen better days. They are victims of change and, to some extent, of carelessness. Take, for example, the villain. He was a farm laborer working on a country estate. The estate was called a villa, and the man was called a villain. It was only after centuries, during which his master sometimes called to him impatiently, "Villain, come here!" that the name began to suggest a scoundrel.

So it is with the others. The hussy, at one time, was a respectable housewife. But housewife was pronounced huzzif; that word, shortened to hussy, was sometimes applied jokingly to a girl. Today we forget the good meaning and remember only the disrespectful one. A boor was merely a farmer; that's what boor meant, not very long ago. The pagan was simply a countryman, a peasant; paganus in Latin meant "a dweller in the country." The savage, as shown by his Franco-Latin name, was simply a sauvage, "a dweller in the woods."

We usually employ the word imp for the boy next door when we want to suggest that he's up to mischief. Yet the name comes from the days when imp was merely another word for "child." In one oldtime book a young English prince is called "that most angelic imp." Knave today means "a rascal, a rogue." At one time it was the word for "boy" or "youth."

The final trio—the silly, the idiot, and the hypocrite—were all perfectly normal. A silly today is one who is weak in intellect; in ancient times, silly meant "happy, fortunate, blessed." Our idiot received his name many centuries ago, when idiot meant "a private person." As to the hypocrite—he dates his name from the old days in classic Greece, when a hypocrite was not a deceitful person at all but merely a mimic, an actor.

AMERICA'S CONTRIBUTIONS

If a language belongs to the people who speak it, the English language surely belongs to America. Today about 60 percent of the world's English-speaking people are citizens of the United States; about 20 percent are found in the British Isles; the other 20 percent live elsewhere.

Since the establishment of the first English settlement in America in the 17th century, American influence on the language of the mother country has grown so great that today an Englishman cannot speak his own language without using words and expressions originating in the New World. Some years ago Dr. Mitford M. Mathews, of the University of Chicago, began to make a list of English words of American origin, and at last count he had reached a total of well over 50,000. These words were not merely terms of American Indian origin (such as tomahawk, wampum, squaw) or of Spanish origin (such as bronco, lariat, stampede) but a host of others that can fairly be classed as household words. Here are a few of them:

advertising	chop suey	lengthy
agent	cute	lipstick
anesthesia	elevator (lift)	moron
appendicitis	faculty	movie automobile	(of school)	O. K.
balance	filibuster	overcoat
(remainder)	fraternity	phonograph
beeline	(college)	refrigerator
belittle	gerrymander	Santa Claus boss	girl friend	single tax boy friend	governmental	sorority cablegram	hamburger	telephone cafeteria	interview	typewriter
casket (coffin)	iron lung	undershirt

Multiplying this list by 1,100 will give some idea of the vast number of words in the English language that are of American origin. The British can accept the situation without embarrassment, for they know that English, the language of Shakespeare and Lincoln, was not created by the people of any single nation. English is a polyglot river, fed by the streams of every land and age, forever changing, ever flowing on. And we have done our share to keep it flowing.

OUR HOSPITABLE LANGUAGE

Our language is rich because it is hospitable. It receives, naturalizes, and uses words from many tongues. Thousands of words of Greek, Latin, French, and German origin will be found in the dictionary pages. In addition, there are many words from other languages.

From Arabic we get coffee, cotton, magazine, matress, sofa, syrup, tariff, zero. Also from Arabic are such words as alcohol, alcove, algebra, and alkali, in all of which the al- means "the."

Among Chinese contributions are tea, china, typhoon.

From Dutch we borrow boss, skate, snoop, skipper, yacht, and many other seafaring terms.

From Hebrew: amen, hallelujah, cherub, and satan.

From Hindustani: khaki and probably calico.

From Hungarian: coach, hussar, shako.

From Italian: alarm, bandit, bankrupt, carnival, ditto, gazette, influenza, piano, sonnet, stucco, studio, umbrella, volcano.

From Japanese: geisha, mikado.

From Malay: bamboo, bantam, caddy (for tea), gong, sago, gutta-percha, ketchup, batik.

From Persian: bazaar, check, shawl, turban, paradise.

From Portuguese: caste, marmalade, cobra.

From Russian: babushka, czar, knout, soviet.

From the Scandinavian languages: fiord, ski, skoal, viking.

From Turkish: ottoman, tulip, caviar.

BEAUTIFUL WORDS

Every few years, presumably when there is a shortage of news, some enterprising reporter asks a number of prominent men and women to make lists of the ten "most beautiful" words in the language. As might be expected, the nominations include a great diversity of words; no two persons have the same eye or ear for words. Beauty in words is somewhat elusive, but ugliness is easy to recognize. No one would give a beauty prize to scratch, or shredded, or eschew.

Popular in many lists of beautiful words are mother, love, truth, and justice, yet all of these have been disallowed on the ground that they are not euphonious. They are beautiful in concept but not in sound. Love may be supremely beautiful in our thoughts, but as a word it is a mere monosyllable that closes on the uninspiring sound of v. The Romance languages are much more fortunate in their words for love: Latin and Spanish amor, French amour, and, notably, the flowing Italian amore, ah-mo'reh, which sounds and sings very well.

The word lullaby is a great vote getter, partly from its sound but probably also from its association with the slumber of innocent infants. Slumber, by the way, is a popular word.

High on many lists are golden, murmuring, and melody; also glow, noble, and soul. The o sound is always liked. Twilight, home, and romance are favored by many voters, and it will be noticed that two of these words contain the o sound, unstressed in romance but definite in home. (The word home also profits from its sentimental associations.)

Smoothness seems to be the deciding factor in judging verbal beauty. The "good round O" is smooth sounding; perhaps even more so is the oo sound as in moon, coo, and the Irish pet name mavourneen. The 18th-century Emanuel Swedenborg, whose studies in words are unique, pictured the language of heaven as containing many long-vowel sounds, with oo as the most important. The oo sound can be tested in a sort of one-sided conversation with a young baby by gently saying "oo" and then waiting for the infantile response. You may have to wait as long as 15 or 20 seconds, but the reaction is almost sure to come in the form of a pleased smile.

Famous among allegedly beautiful English words is cellar-door. This word was chosen many years ago by the Italian patriot Mazzini, when he began to learn English. To him the sound of cellar-door was fascinating. As he formed his opinion in England, we may assume that he heard the word with its 19th-century British pronunciation of selladaw.

George Whitefield, 18th-century English preacher, who spent some years in America, gave a vogue to the long word Mesopotamia. It is said that by merely uttering that word he could reduce a great audience to tears. To this day some public speakers talk about "the true Mesopotamia ring," referring to an utterance with more ring to it than reason.

NEW WORDS

New words are always entering the language. The ways in which new words come into existence are many, and the rate at which they enter varies with the times. Four of the main sources of new words are borrowing, construction, compounding, and affixing. In the past, as we have seen, English borrowed a large number of words, called loan-words, from other languages.

In our own time, constructed words probably account for most of the additions to the vocabulary. Constructed words are formed from word elements of other languages, usually Greek or Latin. For instance, bathyscaph is from the Greek bathys, deep, and skaphe, boat. Most constructed words appear in technical vocabularies. Some, however, do gain wide currency: antibiotic and transistor, for example.

Another important source of new words is compounding, the joining of two existing words: paperback and spacewalk, for example.

Many new words are formed by affixing, the addition of living prefixes or suffixes (such as pre-, non-, and -ize) to a word. Affixed words often originate in conversation to satisfy the needs of a particular situation. Thus, even an unabridged dictionary does not contain all of the many affixed words in use.

A short description of some other sources of new words follows: Conversion is the transfer of a word from one part of speech to another. Conversion of a noun to a verb, for example, to invoice and to contact, is common. Blending is the combination of parts of different words: brunch from breakfast and lunch. Acronyms are words formed from the initial letters of a phrase: laser and radar. Proper or trade names are sometimes adapted as common nouns: diesel and nylon. Shortening usually involves a single word, rather than a phrase: phone from telephone.

Many words are transitory and are not in currency long enough to be included in a dictionary. Other words (such as the Latin additions of the 16th century or new words of the Space Age) are relatively permanent members of the language and are altered or eliminated only in the long, slow, complex process of language change.

The following list is composed of three types of current words: (1) new words, such as spacewalk, (2) words with new meanings or applications, such as abort and Augmented Roman, and (3) existing words that are new to popular usage, such as LSD-25.

abort, a·bärt', v.t. To cancel or cut short a space flight, usually because of the craft's failure to perform its purposes.

aerospace, ār'ō·spās', a. Referring to the earth's atmosphere and space.

aquonaut, ak'wa·nat, n. One who explores underwater phenomena.

Augmented Roman, n. A phonetic alphabet system that utilizes 43 characters to represent the speech sounds of English, used in teaching reading.

bathyscaph, bath'i·skaf, n. A submarine-like craft used in exploring extreme depths of the oceans and in other oceanographic research.

biodegrade, bi'ō·di·grād', v.t. To break down a substance by means of bacterial action.

bistatic radar, n. A radar system that utilizes three bodies: the earth, the object of study, and an artificial satellite, which carries receiving equipment (conventional, monostatic radar having the transmitter and receiver in one place).

booster rocket, n. A rocket engine that provides the necessary thrust, or pushing force, to launch a spacecraft and place it in orbit. (Also referred to as a launch vehicle.)

centrifuge, sen'tri·fūj, n. An apparatus in which equipment, human beings, or animals are rotated and subjected to conditions simulating the accelerations encountered in a spacecraft.

collision course, n. A course taken by a craft, especially a missile, that will cause it to intercept and collide with another craft.

comsat, kām'sat, n. A blending of communications and satellite.

countdown, kount'doun, n. The period during which the sequence of actions necessary to launch a spacecraft is carried out.

deep space probe, n. A space vehicle designed to explore regions near the moon and beyond.

destruct, dē·strukt', v.t. To deliberately destroy a spacecraft before it has completed its course, usually because of a malfunction that makes the craft a hazard.

docking, dok'ing, n. The operation of bringing together and joining two craft in space.

escape velocity, n. The speed that a body must attain in order to leave the gravitational pull of a celestial body.

exobiology, eks'ō·bi·o'lo·ji, n. The study of living organisms that exist on celestial bodies other than the earth.

garbage, gar'bij, n. Miscellaneous objects in orbit that have been ejected or have broken away from spacecraft.

hold, hōld, n. The temporary halt of a countdown to remove an impediment so that the countdown can be continued (compare with abort and scrub).

laser, lā'zer, n. [An acronym for light amplification by stimulated emission of radiation.] A device that generates a concentrated light beam that can be used to carry communications signals, to weld hard materials (such as the exotic metals used in the aerospace industry), to perform some kinds of surgery, etc.

LEM, lem, n. [An acronym for lunar excursion mod- ule.] A small spacecraft that is designed to carry two men and equipment and to be launched from another manned craft in order to make a landing on the moon.

LSD-25 (lysergic acid diethylamide), n. A drug that can cause hallucinations and other simulated symptoms of mental disorders, used primarily in psychological experimentation.

magnetosphere, mag·net'·ð·sfēr', n. The region of space around a celestial body that is dominated by that body's magnetic field.

microelectronics, mi'krō·ē·lek·tron'iks, n. A branch of electronics concerned with extreme miniaturization of components, especially circuits. [Amplifier circuits smaller than an aspirin tablet have been produced.]

module, mod'ül, n. A self-contained unit of a spacecraft that serves as a functional part of the craft.

op art, n. A form of painting that evinces strong visual responses by utilizing various optical effects; optical art.

OSO, ð'sō, n. [An acronym for orbiting solar observatory.] A series of U.S. artificial satellites used in solar research.

plus count, n. The count, in seconds, that immediately follows the launching of a spacecraft, used to check the sequence of events after the countdown has ended.

pop art, n. A form of painting and sculpture that uses as subject matter such things as comic strip characters, advertisements, product packages, etc.

rendezvous, ran'dā·vō, n. The meeting of two or more spacecraft in space at a prescheduled time and place.

retrorocket, re'trō·rok'et, n. A rocket used to retard the forward motion of a spacecraft.

roll, rōl, n. The rotational movement of a craft about its longitudinal axis.

scrub, skrub, v. t. To cancel a rocket firing, either before or during the countdown.

shutdown, shut'down, n. The automatic switching off of the booster rocket in order to prevent a liftoff, possibly because of a malfunction in one of the spacecraft's systems.

soft landing, n. A landing, on a celestial body other than the earth, that avoids a crash of the landing vehicle.

spacewalk, spās'wak, n. The activity of an astronaut that takes place outside the spacecraft; extra vehicular activity (EVA).

staging, stāg'ing, n. The method of using a booster and one or more rockets in a spacecraft, in which each state, as it burns out, is jettisoned.

sustainer engine, n. A rocket that maintains the velocity a spacecraft attains from its booster rocket.

tracking, trak'ing, n. The various means of observing the movements of spacecraft.

T-time, n. Any specific time either before or after the launching of a spacecraft, for instance, "T minus 40," meaning 40 minutes prior to launch.

voiceprint, vois'print, n. A spectrograph, or visible representation, of the sound patterns of the human voice.

weightlessness, wāt'les·nes, n. The absence of apparent gravitational pull on an object.

yaw, ya, n. The lateral rotational movement of a craft about its vertical axis.

HOW TO USE THIS DICTIONARY

For most users of this dictionary the entries will explain themselves. None the less, a few words of introduction may be useful.

To find a word, we must know how it is spelled. When several spellings are in use, they appear under cross-entries. Thus the main entry for czar is indexed also under tsar and tzar. The order of information is as follows: (1) The word itself. (2) Its pronunciation, according to the sound-spelling system at the foot of each page and explained in the key to pronunciation. Stress is shown by this sign (') after the stressed syllable. In some words an additional heavier stress is indicated by the same sign doubled ("). (3) The part of speech, shown by n. for noun, v. for verb, a. for adjective, and so forth, and explained in the list of abbreviations and signs used in this dictionary. (4) The derivation of the word, in brackets, with related words in other languages. (5) The meaning or meanings of the word, often followed by idioms or familiar phrases.

PRONUNCIATION

In speaking, choice of the right word is important, but that word must be given an acceptable pronunciation. Absolute uniformity of pronunciation is neither possible nor necessary. A dictionary noting local speech variations heard in all fifty States of the Union would be confusing. The pronunciations in the present work represent an American standard, acceptable wherever English is spoken.

Sometimes a sound-spelling may seem strange, as when exhibit is spelled ig·zib'it. Possibly at one time the word was pronounced eks·hib'it, but not now. Long ago the eks, because it was unstressed, was worn down to igs, and the h, because its utterance called for more breath, was dropped entirely. Today only a foreign student would carefully say eks·hib-it. Exhibition, on the other hand, is pronounced eg'zi·bish'on, because here the eks, somewhat stressed, was protected from vowel change.

Stress, in speech as in music, is a valuable aid to expression, but when it is placed on the wrong syllable, the effect is absurd, especially when it is put on an unaccented syllable. A person may be heard talking about CREE-ation, YEW-nited States, DEE-mocracy, REE-publicanism, and so forth. Such a practice, presumably used to emphasize the words, only distorts them. The case is similar with final unstressed syllables; for example, there is no age in damage, no page in rampage, no sage in message. The accepted pronunciations are, respectively, dam'ij, ramp'ij, mes'ij.

Stress is important even with monosyllables. In the sentence "He asked her boy to call James" (hē askt hēr boi tū kəl jāmz), the word to is pronounced tū, because it is obscure and unstressed. Only when stressed is it given its full sound tö, rhyming with "moo."

Early in the 20th century an American publisher issued a book entitled 25,000 Words Frequently Mispronounced. This is a most discouraging title, until we realize that the list included many geographic, theological, scientific, and foreign terms seldom used by the average citizen.

Pronunciation of English varies to some extent, which is not to be wondered at, for the language is spoken by about 300 million people. Some variation is noted even in the pronunciation of the well educated.

Here is a short list of words that are often mispronounced. Preferred pronunciations for them are found in the dictionary entries.

accessory	column	liqueur
accompanist	coupé	perfume (n.)
address	decade	presentation
adult	envoy	program
ally	exemplary	promulgate
anti-	exquisite	respite arctic	genuine	semi-athletic	gesture	statistics
bade	gist	suite
bulwark	lingerie	vagary

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION

In showing the pronunciation the simplest and most easily understood method has been adopted, that of rewriting the word with a set of letters that have invariably the same sound, no matter by what letter or letters the sounds may be expressed in the word whose pronunciation is shown. The key by this means is greatly simplified, the reader having only to bear in mind one mark for each sound. Sounds and letters, it must be remembered, are often very different things. In English there are a great many more sounds than letters to represent them, so that some of the letters stand for more than one sound. The letter a, for instance, has at least six or seven, namely, those given in the accompanying table and two more, as in the words any and quality, which may be better represented by e and o respectively. Our alphabet is therefore very far from being a perfect alphabet, which would have a distinct letter for each sound and would always represent the same sound by the same letter. The following is a list of characters and key-words used to show the pronunciation in the dictionary.

ä as in fate	i as in pin
ä as in far	ō as in note
â as in fare	o as in not a as in fat	ö as in move
ā as in fall	ū as in tube
ē as in me	u as in tub
e as in met	ū as in bull
ê as in her	oi as in oil
ī as in pine	ou as in pound

CONSONANTS

ch as in chain	ng as in sing
ch as in Sc. loch	th as in then
	Ger. nacht
g as in go	th as in thin
j as in job	w as in wig hw as in whig zh as in azure

This system, it is believed, will be sufficient for all practical purposes, and the intelligent reader will not care for greater nicety. Consonants not in the list are used simply with their ordinary sounds.

Accent.—Words consisting of more than one syllable receive an accent, as the first syllable of the word labor, the second of delay, and the third of comprehension. The accented syllable is the most prominent part of the word and is denoted by the mark ('), as in the words la'bor, de'lay, and comprehen'sion.

Many polysyllabic words are pronounced with two accents, the primary and the secondary accent, as the word excommunication, in which the third as well as the fifth syllable is commonly accented. The accent on the fifth syllable is the primary accent, and when it requires to be indicated in the pronunciation it receives a double mark, thus (''), the secondary or inferior accent receiving only the single mark ('), as in excommu'nica'tion.

When a word is capitalized and italicized, it is a variant and directs the reader to the desired information.

PREFIXES AND SUFFIXES

PREFIXES

A-. From A. Sax. a- intensive, as in arise, awake.

A-. From A. Sax. of, as in adown, athirst, anew, akin.

A-. From A. Sax. of, o', as in o'clock (a-clock).

A-. From A. Sax. on, as in afoot, abed, aboard.

A-. From L. ab, from, as in avert.

A-. From L. ad, to, as in achieve, ascend.

A-. From A. Sax. and-, against, as in along.

A-. From L. ex, out, modified by Angl. Fr. a from O. Fr. e, as in amend, affray.

A-. From Gr. a- privative or negative, sometimes through L. or Fr. as in abysm, agnostic, amorphous.

Ab-, from, away, as in abduct, abjure. From L. ab, from, preposition and prefix; allied to E. of, off, Gr. apo, from or away. Before c and t, generally assumes the lengthened form abs, also appears as a- (see A-).

Abs-. See Ab-.

Ac-. A form of Ad-.

Ad-, to, toward, at or near, as in adapt, admit. From L. ad, to, preposition and prefix; allied to E. at. Takes by assimilation the forms ac-, af-, ag-, al-, an-, ap-, ar-, as-, at-, as in accede, affirm, aggregate, allude, annex, applaud, arrogant, assume, attribute, also appears as a- in ascend.

Ad-, Ag-, Al-. Forms of Ad-.

Al- (Arabic al, the), as in alchemy, alcohol, algebra, alkali.

Ambi-, Amb-, about, around, as in ambition, amputate. From L. ambi, amb-, on both sides, around; allied to Gr. amphi, about, L. ambo, both; A. Sax. emb, ymb, G. um, about.

Amphi-, about, around, on both or all sides, as in amphibious, amphitheater. From Gr. amphi, about, around, preposition and prefix. See Ambi-.

An-. (1)=Ad-. (2) Not, negation or privation, from Gr. an- or a-, the negative prefix, as in anarchy. Allied to E. un-, L. in-, not. (3)=A. Sax. and-, against, opposite, as in answer. Appears as a-, in along. Same as Goth. and-, Gr. ant-, ent-, Gr. anti.

Ana-, up, through, throughout, as in analysis, anatomy, anabasis. From Gr. ana, up, preposition and prefix; allied to E. on.

Ant-, against, as in antagonist, antacid. Same as Anti-.

Ante-, before, as in antecedent, antedate. From L. ante, before, preposition and prefix. See Anti-.

Anti-, against, in opposition, as in antichrist, anticlimax. From Gr. anti, against, preposition and prefix; allied to L. ante, before, and to the A. Sax. prefix and-, an-, seen in answer. See An-.

Ap-. A form of Ad-.

Apo-, Aph-, away, apart, off, as in apostle, apostate, aphelion. From Gr. apo, from, away, preposition and prefix; allied to L. ab, from, E. off. See Ab-.

Ar-. A form of Ad-.

Arch-, Archi-, chief, head, ruling, as in archbishop, architect, archangel. From Gr. archi, chief, from archē, rule, beginning.

As-, At-. Forms of Ad-.

Auto-, self, of one's self, as in autograph, automatic. From Gr. auto-, from pronoun autos, self.

Be-. From A. Sax. be-, bi-, from bi, big=E. by. Has various meanings: by or near, or denoting locality, as in beside, beneath, below; with a causative or intensive force, as in benumb, besprinkle, bemire; with a privative force, in behead; upon or against, as in befall.

Bi-, twice, two ways, double, as in bicycle, biennial, bisect. From L. bi-, double, for older dui-, akin to duo, two (compare bellum, war, for duellum), and to E. two.

Bis-, twice, double, as in biscuit. Longer form of Bi-.

Cata-, Cath-, Cat-, down, downward, through, according to, as in cataract, cataclysm, catarrh, catholic, catechism. From Gr. kata, down, through; preposition and prefix.

Circum-, around, all round, as in circumnavigate, circumspect, circumstance. From L. circum, round, preposition and prefix; from circus, a circle. Seen also in circuit.

Cis-, on this side of, as in cisalpine. From L. cis, preposition and prefix.

Co-, Col-. Same as Com-.

Com-, with, together, altogether (intensively), as in combine, compound, command. From L. com-, prefix, used for preposition cum, with, allied to Gr. syn, Skr. sam, with. Appears also as co-, col-, con-, cor-, as in co-exist, collect, connect, correspond.

Con-. Same as Com-.

Contra-, against, as in contradict, contravene. From L. contra, against, preposition and prefix, from con-, or cum- and -tra (as in intra, within, extra, beyond), akin to trans, across, Skr. tar, to pass.

Cor-. Same as Com-.

Counter-, against; same as Contra, but directly from Fr. contre, against.

De-, down, from, away, as in descend, denude, depart, describe. From L. de, from, out of, preposition and prefix. In some cases, represents O. Fr. des-, from L. dis-, apart, as in decry, defeat.

Demi-, half, semi-. From Fr. demi. See dictionary.

Di-, double, as in dimorphous. From Gr. di-, double, akin to dis-, bis-.

Dia-, through, between, double, as in diameter, diagnosis, dialogue. From Gr. dia, through, between, preposition and prefix; akin to di-, dis-.

Dif-. A form of Dis-.

Dis-, apart, asunder, in two, as in disarm, discharge, disfract; also used negatively, as in disbelief, disapprove. From L. dis, asunder, preposition and prefix; allied to Gr. dis, di-, double, and to L. bis, twice.

Dys-, bad, ill, difficult, as in dysentery, dyspepsia. From Gr. dys-, prefix.

E-. Same as Ex-. In enough, e- represents A. Sax. prefix ge-; in esquire, estate, it is a mere euphonic element prefixed for ease in pronunciation.

Ec-, Ex-, out, as in ecstasy, eclectic, exodus. From Gr. ek, ex, out, preposition and prefix, akin to L. ex.

Ef-. A form of Ex-.

Em-, En-, in, as in embrace, enclose, enlist; or used with a causal force, as in enable, enlarge. From Fr. em-, en-, L. im-, in-, preposition and prefix. See In-.

En-, in, as in encaustic, energy. From Gr. en, in, preposition and prefix, akin to L. in, A. Sax. in, in.

Enter-, between, among, as in enterprise. From Fr. entre, L. inter. See Inter-.

Epi-, Eph-, Ep-, upon, over, as in epitaph, epithet, epidermis, ephemeral. From Gr. epi, upon; akin to Skr. api.

Es-, out, away, as in escape, escheat. From L. ex, q.v.

Eu-, well, as in eulogy, euphony. From Gr. eu-, well, prefix, neuter of eus, good, for esus, from root as, to be (seen in E. is).

Ex-, out of, out, from, as in exceed, exclude; also used intensively, as in exacerbate, exasperate. From L. ex, out, akin to Gr. ek, ex, out. See Ec-. Appears also as e-, ef-, es-.

Extra-, beyond, without, as in extraordinary, extrajudicial. From L. extra, without, preposition and prefix, from ex and -tra. See Contra-.

For- Used intensively or almost negatively, as in forgive, forbid, forgo. From A. Sax. for-, same as Icel. and Dan. for-, D. and G. ver-, Goth. fra-; allied to far, L. per.

Fore-, beforehand, in advance, as in foretell, foreshow, foreground. See FORE, in dictionary.

Hemi-, half, as in hemisphere. From Gr. prefix hēmi-, half, akin to L. semi.

Hetero-, other, different, as in heterodox, heterogeneous. From Gr. heteros, other.

Holo-, whole, entire, as in holograph, holocaust. From Gr. holos, whole.

Homo-, same, as in homonym. From Gr. homos, same; allied to E. same.

Hyper-, over, beyond, too; hyperborean, hypercritical. From Gr. hyper, above, over, preposition and prefix; allied to L. super, E. over, up.

Hypo-, under, beneath, as in hypocaust, hypotenuse, hypothesis. From Gr. hypo, under, preposition and prefix; allied to L. sub, under.

Il-, A form of In- (2 and 3).

Im- A form of In-.
